Neither man jost any time in getting to work. They were like a pair of long-shoremen. Science was thrown to the winds: Both men knew that stiff punching and real slugging were the elements hat would decide the contest. It was biff-bang, hammer and tongs while it lasted. Stiff uppercuts, hard jolts, long and dangerous swings and wicked jabs were dished out in a way to gratify the palate of the veriest connoisseur of the ert of hit and get away.

There Was No Blocking.

Instead of stopping the blows with the Carter Went Down for Count.

Instead of stopping the blows with the glove, arm or shoulder hearly all of them were stopped by the nose, eye, cnin, ribs or stomach. Both were willing to take a blow to return one. The fists shot out like a piston rod, and man of the blows would make a mule's kick appear like a child's slap.

Carter was the first of the pair to negotiate with the mat. Maher caught him a wicked swing on the jaw and the Brooklyn man went down for the count. He was a trifle unsteady, but able to be up and about. It did not take him long to reach Maher's sky-ploce, which marked the beginning of the end. After this it was only a question of time how long the "Man from Dublin" could stand the gaff. The "Kid" solved the problem, and inside of a minute the fight was over and Carter was returned the winner.

Both men tried for an early ending. Maher worked his left hook effectively and landed a wicked swing which looked good to end the battle. Carter was not feazed. The blow landed over the eye, from which the blood began to flow freely. The blow seemed to wake up Carter, and he very soon returned the compliment, and the crimson fluid ran down Maher's face from a deep cut over the eye.

Both Were Bleeding.

Each man played for the gashes, and when the going sounded there was little to choose between them. Carter left many openings, of which Peter was too slow to take advantage. Maher also lacked confidence and fought somewhat shy of his young opponent's slodge-hammer blows.

Big Bob Armstrong was best man for Carter, and when Charley Harvey, of New York, announced the two men the firm holl Maher had on the local patrons of the sport was easily seen by the freention he received. The men agreed to break clean.
